A new blueprint for inclusive AI innovation

In the latest installment of the Grow Digital Insights series, Dr. Begoña G. Otero takes us inside a hackathon that dared to flip the script on tech innovation.

What happened: More than 300+ people gathered for the OdiselA4Good Hackathon. Unlike your typical "disrupt everything" event, this one focused on vulnerability—building AI tools for migrants, elderly folks, and other underserved communities.

Of 42 original teams, only 7 kept going months later. But here's the kicker—they're creating some genuinely useful stuff:

- Migration guides for asylum seekers
- Plain-language tools for government websites
- AI companions for lonely seniors
- Medication management for caregivers

Why it matters: A new EU report backs up what this hackathon proved: we're funding companies, not ideas. If policymakers and funders want AI that truly serves society, they need to rethink innovation ecosystems—valuing collaboration, lived experience, and care over disruption and market returns.
